The banana, one of the world's most popular fruits, is grown in 135 countries around the world. Bananas are an important food in many countries in Africa, the *Caribbean, and Southeast Asia. Although we usually think of bananas as a food, in some countries they are also used to make popular drinks. In addition, the banana is used to make paper in some countries.

Bananas grow on plants that look like trees. Most banana plants are about 5 meters high. The banana plant needs warm weather and a lot of water to grow well. In fact, a banana is 75% water, so the countries (1) are good for growing this fruit.

Bananas are grown on large farms. We call these farms plantations. But plantations are (2) from farms. Only one type of fruit (or plant) is grown on a plantation; farms may have many different things growing at one time. *Cotton, coffee, and tea are examples of products grown on a plantation.

Bananas grow on the stem of the plant and turn upward. If you see them, you may feel they are pointing to the sun. One large group of bananas is called a hand. Each of the bananas is (3). About 200 bananas will grow on one plant. Bananas are picked when they are still green. Then, if they are kept warm, they grow and become yellow slowly. So you should never keep bananas in the refrigerator.

Though there are many different kinds of bananas, almost all bananas that (4) are the same type; the Cavendish. The Cavendish banana is popular because it grows quickly, is easy to move, and it stays fresh longer than other types of bananas. Another good point about bananas is that they are not a seasonal fruit. In other words, you can buy them any time of year.

7 次の英文を読んで、本文中の(1)～(10)についてそれぞれの問いに答えなさい。

In 1926, *tension between Japan and the United States was increasing. An American man named Dr. Sidney L. Gulick wanted to improve friendship and understanding between the (1) two countries. He had an idea. He thought American children should send dolls to the children of Japan. He believed that (2) this would help international communication and encourage peace.

During 1926, he started a project to gather dolls together and send them to Japan. He wanted the Japanese to receive them before the celebration of Hina Matsuri (Doll Festival) (3) March 3, 1927. Many American adults and children helped the doll project and 12,739 dolls (4) to Japan as *ambassadors of goodwill from the U.S.A. Each doll had a name, a passport, a train and ship ticket, and a letter written by people who sent the dolls.

When the American dolls arrived in Japan, they were very popular. The dolls were given to many schools all over the country. Not all of the dolls had blue eyes, but soon (5)() () (A) () (B) () () “*Blue-eyed Doll” by *Ujo Noguchi.

But this great effort to increase understanding and peace was not successful. In 1941, war started between Japan and the United States. During World War II, the Japanese government said all American Blue-eyed Dolls must be destroyed. They said they were now “enemy dolls.” After that, many dolls were thrown (6) fire, cut up, or broken. American *bombs dropped on Japanese cities in 1945 destroyed many more dolls, and the schools (7) they were in.

But many Japanese teachers, parents, and students did not listen to the government. They did not destroy the dolls. (8) They protected them and kept them safe. It was dangerous for them to (9) do this because they were probably *punished by the government.

We have found about 300 of the American Blue-eyed Dolls. These dolls are a treasure to today’s Japanese children and adults. The dolls show us that international understanding and friendship is always better than fighting. And they tell us we must continue to work hard to make (10) in our world.
